Indiana Family Unlocks Secrets to Their Past with Interesting Implications for African-American Families

One Indiana family has discovered secrets to their family heritage that may have some interesting implications for the African Diaspora. Clemestine Marshall Carter's family was in for the shock of their lives when they submitted their DNA for genetic testing, discovering that they had six DNA markers matching those of two well-known Egyptian Pharaohs.

The Marshall family had previously assumed that they, like many African-American families, were of West African heritage; however, some doubts arose and the Carter family tracked down expert help them in their quest to understand their family's history. Daniel Kolos, an Egyptologist in Toronto, guided them to the Journal of the American Medical
